Positioning

A companion novel to the recently released The Fourth Winter, Orphea and Eurydicus is a linked literary novel in seventeen self-contained chapters, tracing editor and writer Veronica Isabel Rockford from childhood through scholarship, publishing, love, loss, and artistic reckoning.

Across Vancouver, Oxford, San Francisco, India, and Gabriola Island, it develops the life and interior history of the woman readers first encounter in The Fourth Winter while remaining fully legible as a stand-alone novel.

For readers of serious literary fiction, linked-story novels, and fiction concerned with identity, editorial life, memory, friendship, love, grief, and the ethics of representation.

The book

Beginning with a child who believes people ought to become explicable if only the right clues are found, Orphea and Eurydicus follows the developing life of a woman who repeatedly discovers that knowledge, intimacy, and interpretation carry limits. Education takes her from Canada to Oxford; publishing takes her onward to San Francisco; friendship, family, art, and grief keep revising the person she believes herself to be.

Each chapter can stand as a story, but the backward references accumulate into a continuous novel. Names and places change, some recur, earlier scenes are re-read, professional judgement becomes personal ethics, and the book increasingly turns its own editorial questions upon its protagonist: what may be inferred, what may be changed, what belongs to another person, and when restraint is itself a form of care.
